One of the best tests of the health of animals is the condition of skin and fur and the market demand for the same. The demand for skins of wallaby and koala from the Promontory has been so great in the past that over 2,000 of each have been removed in one year. The illustrations which accompany this report have been chosen from a large series as characteristic of the features of the National Park. They embrace the approach to the Park, showing the Derby River flats, one of the granite-capped hills, a scene in the grass-tree country, and a view in the banksia forest. Coastal views have not been selected, as such are not really in the Park reservation. General Zoology...
