Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: .of the sea, the deposits which accumulated beneath the ice, or just at the mouths of the under-ice streams, have in a most complete way been sheeted over by the later-formed masses of sand. In searching for these eskers, which, as observation shows, are in some cases but slightly buried, sometimes at no greater depth than 3 or 4 feet, the observer should select those points of the plain which are opposite the breaches or very low points in the frontal moraine. In practically all cases these breaches correspond to the point of emergence of a subglacial stream, and the appropriate place for the corresponding esker is on the line of that low depression in the morainal wall. In many cases, especially where the subglacial stream was large, the esker corresponding to a breach in the moraine is found to the northward, beyond the accumulation of large boulders which was formed at the front of the ice. As before remarked--and the statement can be made with even greater emphasis with reference to southeastern Massachusetts--the pebbles contained in the eskers are generally very well fitted for use in road making, for the reason that they are bits which have survived the rudest use to which the rough treatment of the ice could expose them. In most cases they were first torn from the bed-rock by the glacier and then subjected to great strains in the rude mill which exists at the bottom of moving ice. Afterwards they...
