In such cases, where the phrasing is not assisted by a change of stroke, the same being intended throughout the phrase, care must be taken that between the strokes employed no pause is made, and the notes bound together as much as possible, for instance: --The marks--between the notes show the passages referred to. The following passage from a concerto by SaintSaens also illustrates the above remarks: --Passages in which clear phrasing is less easily possible, owing to quick time and mixed bowings, must at least have their spirit and intention unravelled; they will then be capable of a successful rendering. The choice of fingering must also receive attention in the interests of a correct and natural phrasing, and the player must especially take care that the changes in the position of the hand are made lightly...
