Eggie s Cafe, East 56th street, NYC. Philo Vance was toying with a cheese and green-pepper omelet when District Attorney John F.-X. Markham sat down at his table. I stopped at your apartment when I heard you were back in town, Vance, declared Markham, but Currie said you were having breakfast, here. How was the shareholder s meeting in Chicago? The District Attorney was a tall, strongly built man of forty-some years with a clean-shaven, chiseled face beneath a neatly trimmed mop of uniformly gray hair. He was not handsome. However he had an unmistakable air of distinction, and culture. This morning he wore his favorite brown wool suit with its years of well formed wrinkles. A week of unbearable heat and tedium, replied Vance. The debonair detective was slightly under six feet in height, fit, and as spotless as a shop-window dummy in a gray tweed ensemble. Fortunately, the newspapers offered daily reports on the Berlin Olympics to keep me from going insane. Jessie Owens certainly made his mark in history - 10.3 seconds in the 100 meter dash. Markham fumbled through his suit, found a cigarette and lit it. His face in the reflected glow of the match looked grim. Those Olympic games are nothing but propaganda mechanism for Adolph Hitler and his goose-stepping goons, complained the District Attorney, bitterly. He dragged over the ashtray sitting on the edge of the table, took a long draw on the cigarette and then blew smoke toward the ceiling. That s why Hitler had that runner with the torch open the ceremonies. It was never done like that before. Vance nodded...
