At present, as at some former periods of history, the wind sets from the quarter of science, and men turn with impatience from speculative philosophy. The material world is the great object of study, and the methods of study are thought sufficient if they are adjusted to that object. The sum of the natural forces being constant, incapable of addition as of loss, there would seem to be no room for a human will; and the laws of these forces can be studied in the phenomena themselves, and therefore do not require that we should seek the first cause of the chain of causes, nor the absolute ground of what is phaenomenal and...
